“Unity doesn’t always mean agreement.”

(Dn. Michael Hyatt)

Sometimes we think we need to agree on everything in order to have unity in our marriage, and the small things we disagree on become bigger than they really are. Being in alignment with our spouse on the important matters of marriage are key; if we know we are on the same path in marriage, if we are in agreement on the purpose/s of marriage, then the disagreements along the way will not seem so looming.

Create a time and space to discuss with one another what you understand to be some of the important purposes of marriage and the pathway to the realization of those purposes. Take note of any differences and consider discussing further with your priest if you are not in agreement on any of the “big” things. When couples are secure in the “big things” then other disagreements take their proper place as “little things.”
